Marxism și indiferență / Marxism and Indifference

Abstract:

There always was as need coming from all those involved in the cultural process (and not only) to define themselves, to show their membership to a certain school of thinking or a generation of ideas. Now, more than ever, this need can easily be observed even by a neutral watcher (though the term neutral has lost its significance a long time ago). Romania hasn't developed yet the same cult of generations that is present in most of the western cultural stages, yet the generation gap is fairly obvious. This text is trying to underline some of the most important features of the newest generation in Romanian philosophy by choosing a random subject: Marxism. Our main purpose is to point out the main features of the generation mentioned above relating their way of thinking with the problem of interpreting Marxism.
