Abstract

Starting from the theory of the social frames of the memory (M. Halbwachs, 1925) and from the culture and interest structure of the memory theory, in this article we put an emphasis on the manner in which the memory of conflict which happened in the Republic of Moldavia in 1992 is organised and reorganised. Through the discursive analysis we identified the linguistic resources used to restructure the collective memory and we have illustrated how the individuals use language to reconstruct representations of the past.
