Abstract

Everybody knows there are certain pupils who feel they are not appreciated at their real value by the teacher. More than that, they feel that the teacher cares more about the good students. The question is whether or not the good students benefit too much of the so called “halo” effect. On the other hand, it also appeared the question whether or not students overestimate themselves when asked about their abilities. This is why we had a teacher evaluating every student from one class, and then we compared his evaluation with the self-evaluation of the students. We also tried to find out if there are any differences between the self-evaluations of the good students, the medium students and the poor students. The results are quite surprising; it appears that the teacher doesn't know his students very well.
