Abstract

Career decision making is a very complex process. As a result, career counselors are confronted with a variety of difficulties that adolescents encounter when making a career decision. In the literature, the construct of “career indecision” is used to denote problems during the career decision-making process. The purpose of this study was to investigate the degree of career indecision for students, boys and girls, in high school (of the Xth and last year) and also the stability and the internality of career decision-making process. The results showed only the effect of age in this process.
